Unit 3 : A Library on Wheels

On their way home from school Guy and Jacque saw something very unusual.

“What in the name of God is that?” Guy shouted with a thick French accent. He pointed toward something parked inside the local temple courtyard parking lot.

“I am not sure,” Jacque replied with a puzzled look on his face. “I can’t see it very clearly from here.”

“Oh yeah. I forgot that you are blind as a bat,” Guy, the older of the two, chuckled.

“I’m not blind!” the portly Jacque defended.

“Whatever you say, Goggles,” Guy responded. “Let’s go take a closer look at that thing.”

They casually strolled through the temple gates and into the courtyard. The strange thing was parked in front of the temple’s main building. But what was it?

“It looks like some geek’s version of a Transformer,” Guy laughed.

“Only instead of changing into a cool robot with special powers, it turns into a library on wheels with the power to put you to sleep in a flash,” Jacque added.

They may not have admitted it, but it was a pretty neat cube van. The side flipped up and then doors/shelves swung outward revealing a veritable library on wheels. There was even a TV on it advertising some of their stuff.

“Well as long as we are here, we might as well see what they’ve got.” Guy said and then sheepishly walked toward the bookmobile. He didn’t want his friend to know that he liked reading. That would ruin his reputation.

“Yeah,” Jacque followed, “as long as we’re here.” They spent the rest of the afternoon browsing through the books on the “un-cool” bookmobile.
