Unit 4: Julie's Collection

Julie's cell phone rings and wakes her from a deep sleep. She rolls over in bed and picks it up.

“Hello,” she says in a groggy voice suggesting that she is still half asleep.

“Good morning Sunshine!” the lady on the other end cheerfully says. “Wakie, wakie, sleepy head.”

“Oh, Susan,” Julie's says as her brain finally starts functioning and it clicks in who she is talking to.

“Are we still on for coffee this morning or are you too tired?” Susan asks.

“Of course,” Julie replies as she climbs out of bed. “Give me fifteen minutes to put my face on and look presentable.”

Susan and her daughter, Sophia, go out for coffee with Julie at least once a week. It gives them a chance to catch up on the week's gossip.

A small grey car parks across the street from the EZ coffee shop in Beido. Young Sophia gets out the passenger side and walks around the car to where her mother is. The two of them cross the road together and enter the busy coffee shop. The place is bustling and they have to wait a few minutes for a seat, but soon they are shown to their table.

While the girls wait for Julie to drag herself out of bed, they browse the menu to see what looks good.

“Hey, guys!” a cheerful voice greets them from behind. “Are you waiting for someone?”

Susan, half startled, turns to see Julie walking toward their table. “Well...look who finally showed up,” Susan responds with a hint of sarcasm.

“Sorry I’m late,” Julie says apologetically. “I had to drop my Doraemon collection off at the babysitter.”

“I am sure they would have been safe in your car.” Susan states while shaking her head at Julie's absurdity.

“You can never be too safe,” Julie says, trying to convince everyone that it was a good idea. “I heard that there was a cat burglar in the neighborhood.”

“You know that a cat burglar doesn't really steal...oh, never mind.” Susan stops herself. She knows there is no convincing Julie about anything when it comes to her Doraemon collection.
