

Unit 6 : Yoga isn't something you eat!

“Hey, Robert, do you want to come to yoga class with me,” Henrik politely asked his good friend.

“Yogurt class? What the heck is that?” Robert was confused. He imagined people sitting around a classroom, eating yogurt together.

“Not ‘yogurt’, yoga! Y-O-G-A, yoga,” he corrected Robert. “Why are people always confusing yogurt with yoga?” The question was rhetorical, but Robert answered anyway.

“I have no idea,” Robert admitted. “So tell me, what is yogurt...I mean yoga, anyway?”

“You’ll have to come with me and find out.”

Henrik and Robert entered the activity room at their elementary school. They were a bit late and class was already in session. The two boys found an empty spot near the front of the class and joined in.

“Just do what I do,” Henrik whispered to Robert. “And don’t worry about looking stupid. No one here will judge you.”

Robert followed Henrik’s every move as closely as he could. He wasn’t nearly as limber as his friend, but he tried his best to emulate each movement.

All of a sudden there was loud ripping noise. Everyone stopped what he or she was doing and looked around to see where the noise had come from.

Robert's face turned beet-red as he realized that the entire class was staring directly at him and his bare bottom. When the poor boy had tried to lunge forward like Henrik, the seam in the back of his pants gave way. The tear went all the way from the belt line to his crotch, leaving his backside exposed. It was like his worst nightmare had become a reality.

Later that night he was able to laugh about it as he told the story to his father. It could have been worse, he thought, at least no cute girls were there to see it. You can bet the next time he decides to join his friend for yoga—if there is a next time—he will be wearing pants that are a little stretchier. It would also be the last time that he would leave the house without wearing any underwear.